Task assessment is a practical and objective measure of organizational planning and judgement skills as performed in a common food preparation task. The score ranges from 0 to 18, with higher scores indicating higher severity of impairment.

Functional assessments are a key tool for screening and assessing a patient. They provide vital information regarding patients' residual skills, their impairments, and task performance. According to Edmands (2010), the aims of a functional assessment are to provide guidance in two basic ways: (1) enabling you to assess your current system against the principles put forward in this document and (2) helping you to develop interventions for individual adaptation strategies for caregivers.

This computer skills assessment sample was taken from a test that was used to gauge if a job applicant had the basic skills needed to work in a healthcare office. The individual conducting the test asked the applicant to complete specific tasks and make a notation if the act was completed properly.

The reliability, validity, and clinical utility of the executive function performance test (EFPT) as a measure of executive function in a sample of people with stroke have been demonstrated. The EFPT does not assess what people cannot do; rather, it identifies what they can do successfully. This short basic functional kitchen assessment allows the occupational therapist to assess both motor and process skills. The occupational therapist completes an activity analysis of the task and takes into account all motor and process skills the task entails.

The preschool kitchen task assessment (PKTA) is a newly developed assessment tool based on the principles of the kitchen task assessment (KTA) and may be a valuable tool for assessing executive function (EF). The children's kitchen task assessment (CKTA) is an ecologically valid assessment that was designed to assess executive functioning skills in children age 7-10. Currently, there is a lack of ecologically valid assessments that test executive functioning in children under seven years of age. The measures included the parent and teacher behavior rating inventory of executive function brief (Delis-Kaplan Executive Function System [D-KEFS] free sorting test and color word interference test) and the children's kitchen task assessment (CKTA) performance measure. Reliability, validity, and clinical utility of the executive function performance test (EFPT) as a measure of executive function in a sample of people with stroke have been demonstrated. There are several published kitchen assessments currently available for use by clinicians. The main objective of this paper was to offer criteria for choosing standardized kitchen assessments from a top-down cognitive perspective in order to help clinicians in selecting the most appropriate kitchen assessment tools.
